

This transcript was exported on Oct 30, 2020 - view latest version here.

Believe it or not, not only is every courthouse a little bit different, but there are vast differences in the procedures between state and federal prosecutions. Federal prosecutions tend to be the investigations can go a year or more. They can stretch out for a long period of time, in which case we're going back and forth with the prosecutors and state. Usually they'll bring the charge, and then you're really just defending. You're getting ready for trial. So, that can be tough. But if you don't know the federal system, you're going to have a hard time really understanding what's going to go on and you're more handicapped in defending the client.